Sponges have no

system but are covered with a hard, liver-colored skin called "gurry", "meat", or "milk". This skin is cut away and the sponges cured and sorted.

The method of obtaining sponges has not changed much over the years. Divers are still equipped with a hand rake and net. Add to that the more sophisticated diving gear which enables them to remain in deep water for longer periods of time.

Though more than 2500 varieties of sponge have been identified, ranging in size from under an inch to six feet in diameter, only about a dozen are used commercially. Primary sources for natural sponges are the Gulf of Mexico from Florida to the West Indies, and the Eastern Mediterranean.

In 1932, man duplicated nature's sponge using cellulose from wood pulp. Cellulose is the major substance of all plant life. Next to water, it is the most common raw material and is used in many products. The finished product may be soft and plush as in rayons, or hard as in telephone casings, durable and shock resistant as in tire cord. It can even by transparent as in cellophane.

Cellulose sponges are designed for absorbency - up to 25 percent of their dry weight. And being a by-product of nature, cellulose is biodegradable.

A series of ten steps goes into making cellulose sponges. Interestingly, holes in a sponge are made by adding crystallized salt. The size of the crystals determines the size of the poren.

Therefore, man-made sponges can simulate nature's own sponge, excellent for household cleaning chores, or the Mediterran sponge for extra fine pores and softness for use as a cosmetic sponge.

Also on the market are compressed sponges which are flat until wetted. Another innovation is sponge cloth, introduced in the 1950's. A waffle-like surface texture serves to soak up twice as much water as ordinary dishcloths.

When a sponge becomes dirty, it is not necessary to discard it. Instead, extend its life by laundering the sponge in a washing machine. Or hand-wash by squeezing suds through the sponge and rinsing thoroughly.
